A Million Dollar Fire.

When Thomas Proctor entered my ofnice one October morning ten years ago,
I little thought the day would prove to the the most eventful in the lives of three men.

I had aided Proctor financially in several promising business ventures,
and they all wound up in disaster,
which was not due to any mismenagement on his part, but to a combination of unfortunate circumstances.

After the last collapse Proctor obtained a situation at a salary which borrely supported his family. This went on for about two years, when his employment about two years, when his enployment about a month, when he

There is little more to tell. I heard Oglethorpe whisper to the chief a contribution to the firemen's relief fund of $1,000 for the possession of that rope, which was duly accepted, and it was afterward generously divided with Tom and me.

Then he said to the former that he was in the habit of settling his contracts—promptly, and there was just time before the banks closed.
